Susan G. Scott : Tableaux dans le tableau

René Viau

Au-delà d'une condition maître à élève, comment se fait la transmission? Les êtres se construisent à même la substance de chair et d'échange des savoirs des autres mais cette transmission ne peut que s'opérer dans la différence de l'autre. Dans ses toiles récentes, Susan Scott qui est peintre et qui est enseignante, nous représente différents tableaux dans le tableau.

Ces scènes sont extraites des ateliers d'une école d'art. Des jeunes artistes travaillent à leur toile. On voit aussi le résultat des territoires picturaux que chacun délimite tandis que le tableau même de Susan Scott devient le lieu où ce continuum est mis en péril. Cette faculté de se déplacer, mais jamais sur le même terrain, nous intrigue. En ce sens Susan Scott ne se contente pas de citer et de déplacer. Un renversement s'opère.

Entre parenté, partage et dissemblance, quelque chose qui engloberait l'histoire même de la peinture récente, de ses techniques, du champ de ses références et de ses distinctions nous est pointé.

D'un tableau à l'autre, les signes, les références transitent. Avec l'image, ce sont les processus, les opérations qui mènent au tableau qui sont aussi figurés. Ce n'est pas tant l'effacement du peintre qui laisse la place à la peinture mais celle-ci, la peinture, ces Images produites qui, placées au cœur du cycle narratif, abolissent la distance d'avec le spectateur pour qui celles-ci ne peignent pour ainsi dire que le fait peindre. Les propositions se mêlent. Les questions d'abstraction et de figuration se confrontent. Ces œuvres sont ainsi capables de tout, voire d'être figuratives et non-figuratives en même temps tout en traduisant le souvenir d'une unité perdue, dorénavant morcelée, d'une évidence se faisant surface désormais hybridée en plusieurs strates tandis que le schéma qui définit la place du spectateur face au tableau fait se croiser et questionner en une étrange réciproque le double rôle du peintre comme modèle et vice-versa

Critique d'art au quotidien montréalais Le Devoir aux périodiques Vie des Arts, Etc Montréal, collaborateur à de nombreuses publications tant en France qu'au Québec, auteur de plusieurs livres sur des artistes québécois.

Susan G. Scott: Paintings within Paintings

Rene Viau

Translation : Christine Unger

Beyond the traditional relationship of Master and pupil, how is the transmission of knowledge achieved? Individuals construct themselves through the experiences of their flesh and the exchange of knowledge with others, but this transfer of knowledge can only take place because of difference; the division between self and other.

In her recent paintings, Susan Scott, both a painter and a teacher, presents various paintings within paintings. Her subject matter is taken from art school studios-young artists at work on their canvases. As a result, one sees the pictorial terrain each student delimits, while Scott's painting becomes the environment where the teacher-pupil continuum is put in question. This ability to shift points-of-view from one visual plane to another without repetition, is intriguing. Susan Scott moves beyond stylistic quotes and shifting imagery. An inversion of perspective takes place.

Between the relationships, divisions, and dissimilarities that the work brings forward, the history of recent painting - its techniques, its fields of reference, and its distinctions - is brought home to us.

Signs and references are carried forward from one painting to the next. The processes and operations carried out by the painter are illustrated within the painting itself. It is not so much the obliteration of the painter that occurs within these paintings of painters painting but, these images, placed at the heart of the narrative cycle, abolish the distance of between the spectator and the painter, leaving only the fact of painting itself. Perspectives blend. The questions of abstraction and figuration are confronted. These works are able to be figurative and not-figurative at the same time - translating the memory of a lost sense of wholeness, now fragmented. Cross-questioning, the surface of the painting is now revealed to the audience, vis-a-vis the painting, as a hybrid of several layers that diagrams and defines the place of painter, revealing the strangely reciprocal double role of painter as model and vice-versa.

René Viau is an Art Critic for the daily Montreal newspaper Le Devoir, the art magazines, Vie des Arts, Etc. Montréal, as well as writing for numerous publications in France and Quebec. He is also the author of several books on the lives of Quebec artists.

Artist's Statement

I have been working on the idea of The Young Artists for the past two years. The paintings can all be read as self-portraits—while they are images of art students at work, they are also images of myself as a young painter learning how to paint. I am using the format of the diptych to juxtapose the seemingly mundane (black and white) world of a young artist working in a studio setting against the (colourful) world of imagination that exists in their minds eye, the painting itself. My intent is to explore the world of choice and self-doubt that are at the heart of the artistic process. In order to create the second (colour) panel of my diptychs I take on the role of the young artist – exercising the limits of my imagination by opening up the possibilities of stylistic choice available to the young artists I am painting.

On a deeper level the juxtaposition of the black and white studio interior on one side, and the colour image which implies the artist's world of imagination on the other, alludes to a digital divide in my thinking that is probably shared by most people of my generation who grew up with black and white photos and black and white cinema. It represents a frame of mind in which black and white symbolizes the authenticity of photography before colour became widely available. The rare black and white images from the 19th and early 20th century of artists working in their studios was the world of my desires as a young artist.

My semi-autobiographic diptychs of young artists working in their studios, painted next to the full colour products of their (my) imaginations, represents a divide in the valuation of colour created by changing technologies. It is an enormous leap for an artist to make without making a complete shift into a digital medium, and it is one which I feel even younger painters must make in order to evaluate the impact of their work on an audience largely comprised of people for whom colour is a matter of precise and known quantities rather than the labour of years of experimentation and subtle and often unpredictable chemical combinations.

This is a series in progress that is composed of many studies, large scale drawings as well as paintings which continues to evolve and change over time.
